Chile is one of the most unique countries in the world for making wine thanks to the diversity of its geography. Its sprawling coastline, rolling plains, mountainous regions, and glaciers that border its southern tip make Chile one of the most interesting places to make red, white, rosé, and even sparkling wine in the world. With a Mediterranean climate, also heavily influeted by the Humboldt Current that cools down the coastline, or the Andes Mountains that provide ventilation and control cloud formation. These factors bring to life some standout wines we all know and love, such as Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot, Carmenere, Syrah, Chardonnay, Sauvignon Blanc, Pinot Noir and many others.

New Zealand's long growing season and cool maritime climate make ideal conditions for grape growing, producing some distinctive, premium-quality wines.

As a result of grapes being grown in such a range of mini-climates and soil types, a diverse range of styles has developed. Sauvignon Blanc is New Zealand's most commonly planted grape, producing the world's best Sauvignon Blanc. Its unique style is more pungently fruity than any other wine from the grape variety.

Chardonnay it's the most widely grown variety, thriving in all of the major wine-growing regions. Hawke's Bay, Gisborne and Marlborough are particularly well known for their Chardonnay, although each region produces its own distinct style, ranging from Gisborne's softer Chardonnay through to the more concentrated wine from Hawke's Bay.

New Zealand Pinot Noir also has a strong international reputation and is the country's second-most exported wine after Sauvignon Blanc. Pinot Noir relishes cool temperatures and low rainfall, so performs particularly well in the Martinborough and Central Otago regions.

Pebble Lane

New Zealand's alluvial plains, dry river beds and cool maritime climate produce these wines of character. Over the millienia rocks and stones have been transported from the mountains by glaciers and rivers before being deposited to form the valley floors. These pebbles capture the warm sun during the day and radiate heat at night to ripen the grapes producing a well balanced wine with berry fruit flavors.

Pebble LaneChardonnay MARLBOROUGH

Layers of tropical, peach and apricot fruit aromas infused with honey notes.

Pebble Lane Pinot Noir MARLBOROUGH

Vibrant purple hues, supple wine with good weight and fruit intensity.

Pebble Lane

Sauvignon Blanc MARLBOROUGH

Intense and complex with a beautifully lifted nose of gooseberry, passion fruit, lemon sherbet and green herb aromas.
